Editorial policy

From ForexLicenseWiki, the free encyclopedia of forex licenses · Last updated 28 November 2026

ForexLicenseWiki is an independent reference. Forex licensing is a field full of marketing claims, so this policy is stricter than usual. It explains where our facts come from, how we keep them current, and how we keep commercial interests out of the articles.

Sources

- Official sources first. Capital, fees, leverage limits and compensation limits come from the regulator, the law or another public body wherever one is available. These references are marked Official.
- Named secondary sources only where needed. If we cannot find a figure published officially, we use a named secondary source (law firm, trade press, adviser), say so in the text and mark the figure as “reported”.
- We say what we could not confirm. “Not confirmed” in a table means exactly that; it does not mean the rule does not exist.
- Where sources conflict, the official source wins and the article notes the conflict.

Neutrality

- No regulator “tiers”. We do not label regulators tier 1, 2 or 3. We compare what the rules require, row by row, so readers can weigh them.
- No broker rankings, reviews or affiliate links. Articles never recommend a broker.
- No broker or introducing-broker advertising on license guides or comparison pages.
- We describe offshore and onshore regimes in the same format and the same tone: what they require and what they protect.

Conflicts of interest

The operator offers paid private consultations on licensing. To keep this separate from the articles: consultation services are never mentioned inside license guides; no jurisdiction is described more favourably because of client demand; and editors with a client engagement in a jurisdiction do not make the final call on corrections to that jurisdiction's guide.

Dates and updates

- Every article shows a Last updated date, which changes only when the content changes, and an “as of” date for its figures.
- License guides are reviewed at least twice a year, and promptly when a regulator changes capital, fees or retail protections.

Corrections

Anyone can use Suggest an edit. Corrections must cite a source, preferably the regulator's own website. Editors check every suggestion against its source before changing an article, and contributors can choose to be credited.

Not advice

Articles are general information, not legal, financial or investment advice. See the disclaimer.
